Leahy, who, despite her American birth and bringing up, is Irish to the backbone objected to a husband who served the English King and waged the trade of war. So Maj. Cooper had to resign and go on half-pay. The Major and his family have lived in Ireland for many years and are thoroughly Irish. Maj. Cooper owns Killenure Castle, County Tipperary, a fine old place, but sadly in need of repairs. His American bride, who is soon to be its mistress, is having the place restored and the gardens and park attended to so that in a short time it promises to be one of the loveliest places in the County.

This is the most southernly scarcely a man who believes the tale. route one can take, and agreeable weather scarcely a man who believes the tale. Mr. Redmond is in a critical position. The leadership is a much harder proposition than it was in Parnell's time. There are so many new political cliques and parties, and they worry Mr. Redmond from all sides. Each party appears to be working against each other. They are all working against the Irish leader, and the combination is a decidedly worrying one. The two strongest "constitutional" men, William O'Brien and Tim Healy, are absolutely opposed to Mr. Redmond's policy and his party. Then there is the Irish National Society, which is composed of men who secoded from the United Irish Leawer.

Toute one can take, and agreeable weather and temperature are almost a certainty. These are important considerations at this season. In addition, there is no annoyance from smoke and cinders, for oil replaces coal as the steam-producing fuel used in the engines. The train equipment includes tourist sleeping cars, as well as high-class sleeping, dining, and observation cars, providing accommodations suited to all purses. Reduced-rate single-way tickets are now being offered via this route and also special rate round-trip tickets. The personally conducted excursions via this route are made through without change, leaving Washington three times a week. The office of the general agent, A. J. A third opposition comes from the Gaelie League, which claims to have no c dence in politics of any color. Lastly, there is the Sinn Fein, which is gathering in strength daily, and may soon be as formidable as the Clan-na-Gael.

The Sinn Fein has taken the place of all the old and forgotten parties of blood. It favors straight revolutionary tactics and has admitted young women now as well as men. The Sinn Fein will not agree to the broadest of home rule. It wants the shackles of England completely and Demand for Absolute Home Rule. The other parties will not accept a final settlement under a home-rule label unless it is absolute home rule. The Parliamen tary party will accept whatever the Liberal ministry doles out in the way of local government as an installment. Mr. Redmond knows this, and so do all seriou politicians here, and they understand that the leader's recent declaration of war against the present Liberal cabinet was only a diplomatic stroke to assuage the murmurings of his epponents and the growing revolutionary parties. The Tories, as expected, have been making a great deal of capital out of Redmond's speech, yet the same statement has practically been made a thousand times by leaders in the last hundred years or so. Gladstone, Salisbury, Balfour, all want ed to give Ireland the fullest kind of home rule, and so does the present cabinet. Presenting Some Novel Ideas.

In the treatment and management of trimming the Parisian makers acknowledge no superiors. While the cut of this important model shows the trend of sircular effects, it is chiefly in the trimming and its application that the novelty lies. There is that bias seam down the center back, a mode of cutting that is held in especial esteem by the French tailor, and with which they secure some of their most fetching results. This is one of those light-weight wraps that are intended for carriage and other semidressy wear, and is in a novel shade of reddish amethyst broadcloth, matching in tone the chiffon velvet gown which it tops. The trimming consists merely of a black satin ribbon, folded by deft fingers into tricorne shapes, and edged on either side with an application of flat braid that serves to hold the pinched ribbon in shape. This ribbon trimming is laid on in a festoon design over the back and front, coming to just below the waist line, and below this are similar folds, each, however, marking a less acute angle in their course.

Lella McIntyre will fill another void with their "Two Hundred Wives" sketch, in The sieeve is especially full and drooping in its upper part, bands of the ribbon which Miss McIntyre reveals all the trimming seeming to hold this fulness over the forearm.

FOR THE FEMININE EYE.

The power of self-control a woman possessed enabled her to catch the thieves who robbed her and get back one hundred dollars in money and some pieces of valuable jewelry. After discovering her loss she began to use her eyes and soon saw a group of boys, presumably playing and roughly jostling pedestrians, relieve another woman of her purse. She caught and held the culprits till the police relieved her of the burden.

Self-control is the rarest and best possession of our sex. There can never be a quarrel if one party can control the tongue and the hands and the brains behind them. There are numberless times when self-control will avert a catastrophe and save a victory. In a recent drowning accident the victim threw his hands in the air and cried for help till he sank once, and, finally, when by keeping his hands and arms under water and moving them ever so little he could have floated till assistance reached him.
